

The Indigenous Health Researchers Database is a comprehensive listing of researchers who are affiliated with a Canadian university and have a wide range of expertise related to the health of Indigenous peoples. These researchers have undertaken some form of research related to the health and well-being of First Nations, Inuit and/or Métis peoples, ranging from one study to a lifetime of work in a particular area. The names of researchers along with their contact information, university affiliation, focus of Indigenous health research, and a selection of their publications are listed by theme and location. Compiled by the National Collaborating Centre for Indigenous Health (NCCIH), this listing is based on publicly available information on university websites in Canada.

SITE NAVIGATION

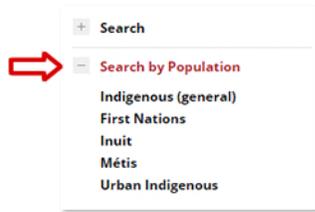

1). To find the researcher database from any page, select, “Indigenous Health Researchers” located below the main menu.

2). Once you are on the “Indigenous Health Researchers” page, you can click on an author’s name to reveal a list of publications.

3). To expand, or collapse, all the entries click on the “Expand/Collapse” icon in the top right corner.

4). The database can be searched by population. To do this, click ‘Search by Population’ and select a population from the drop-down menu.

5). Alternatively, you can search by text entry in the search box. Click “Search,” then type what you are looking for in the search box and hit enter when done.

6). To remove a search, simply click on the “X” on the grey box for the search term.

7). To sort the list, click on the AZ sorting icon in the top right corner.

8). To print the list, click on the print icon in the top right corner.

9). To request edits to an author's entry, or to request to be added to the database, please email nccih@unbc.ca.

To be included in this database, researchers must:

- Have at least one Indigenous health publication released since 2014.
- Be affiliated with a Canada university, including status as a faculty member, adjunct professor, clinical professor, professor emeritus, or director/researcher of a research institute affiliated with a Canadian university.

Researchers who self-identify as First Nations, Inuit or Métis are invited to have this information added to their profile.
